DAYTON, OHIO, February 20, 1976 --- Dr. Ellis Joseph will step out of his role as University of Dayton administrator to speak on issues that began to concern him as a Notre Dame graduate student as the second spring lecturer in the Values and Rights in Public Education Lecture Series. The talk, which is a part of the free lecture series sponsored by the University of Dayton's Center for Values in Education and the Ohio Program for the Humanities will begin at 7:30 p.m. in the Kennedy Union Ballroom on February 26.

In a lecture entitled "The Importance of the Humanities in a Technological Age," the School of Education Dean will discuss the effects of humanism which refuses "the dominance of supernatural over reason."

"Over the years people have talked about two cultures, the humanities and technology, and how to bring them together," Dr. Joseph said. "The important issue is that the humanities and technology are separated from one another because of their separation from the ultimate sources of the human spirit: God and Religion... I suspect we'd see a heck of a lot more relationship between them if they weren't separated from God and Religion."

Dr. Joseph, who has two books and numerous articles to his credit, became dean of UD's school of education in 1972 after an eight year term as chairman of the University's secondary education department.
